

Fake News

By Dr. R. Pletsch

There are not many reading this article that are not aware of the term "fake news". It is an effort to sway opinion by producing articles that can be in the press, TV shows or social media, that is not intended to relay true facts to its audience.

Fake news is a one-sided argument at best and at its worst, just plain lies. This method has been used by the press for hundreds of years. But in the past, they called it opinion of the editors. Recently they have just called the articles news.

How many times have the headlines or lead stories been predicting the "smoking gun" and it is not talked about in a week because people realize it was a lie and instead of correcting their mistakes they go on with another story. Why do they continue? That's easy. It works with certain people.

Stephen Sawchuk recently wrote about a study by Stanford History Education Group (SHEG) in "Education Week" that indicates the students they tested in grades 9 - 12 are terrible at identifying fake news from real news.

The study included students who had taken a course in media literacy. It included five videos and the students were to determine what they meant and what they meant was it reliable. They were given a list of advocacy groups to research the issue. Very few did well. They also checked students on reading State websites and news articles.

The questions included political subjects, like global warming and voting fraud. Ninety-seven percent of the students received very poor scores. Very few in this tech savvy age were able to research to determine what was truth and what was fake.

The test results showed students A) that had free lunch scored significantly lower than the other students. B) Black students did poorer than white students. C) The mother's formal education was significant, the higher their education, the higher the scores. D) The 12th graders scored better than the 9th graders, and E) Students from urban areas scored higher than students from rural areas. These results help researchers seek more funds for more studies. SHEG sees a need for more help and classes in media literacy.

The school day is not so long that it can constantly be adding classes to the curriculum without taking it away from somewhere else. As long as the press tells stories they know are wrong -- like showing military footage from our base in Kentucky and claiming it was US attacking in the Middle East and never firing the people who lied on the air, or ever bring to task who give opinion as if it were news, there is little hope of change.

If reading is to improve in the elementary schools, it is hopeful that by high school they can better interpret data than they are now. But most students do not find the time to watch three or four news channels, and, of course, they don't read newspapers often.

The story that gets through has people who would vote to change the curriculum or send more money for it. If it is working, why would you want to change it? You might talk about it, but never act on it. The more the politicians use the media to argue about fake news, the less likely our students will really understand.

Many of the students I talk with don't watch the news regularly. They just hear blips and sadly, many accept the blips as the true story.
