Calculus, Trigonometry and Physics

By Dr. R. Pletsch

There are professional educational organizations that discuss these classes and where they should fit in the school system's curriculum. These are titles of subjects that seem to automatically indicate to many the quality of the system and the particular

In general, classes attended by parents, some with staff members, were often given by teachers like myself in efforts to give smaller schools the ability to work together with staff members from other area schools. These classes were considered to be a part of all quality high school curriculum. Many considered it a necessity for your school to succeed. Yet, the professional Math organizations often argued that Calculus should be moved to colleges and change its sequence in the curriculum. The argument for was Business Majors, which far outnumbers Math, had to pass Business Calculus for them to succeed in the program.
College placement officers admitted that Calculus students were given "an edge" in placement and that about 53% of the colleges admitted that this seemed correct. There is already a clear edge to families with higher income that those families may have other members who have already attended college. Often this is a great advantage to students in these families who are sometimes listed as the most educated already in their families. If you don't already know what Calculus or Trig or Physics is, it is simply a matter of being introduced to the subjects. There also seems to be a discrepancy with schools that are majority Black or Latino only 38% of the high schools even offered Calculus, while 50% of schools with 50% or more White offered the classes.

The 2013 stats show Calculus does not show enormous gains compared with students that ended high school with their highest Math class being Pre-Calculus. It is argued that Math majors think differently than the rest of us. I taught high school Math for years and many of those students became quite successful as adults and some include even Doctorates. I've talked with several of them at reunions and funerals and they seem to think that high school Calculus made little dif-ference in their quest toward success in the workplace. If you wish to look these things up, Sarah Schwartz of Education Week has much detail available on the internet.

Archer Heights Library Fall Color In Forest Preserves Schedules Programs

Fall foliage is set to peak in October this year, and the Forest Preserves of Cook County can help visitors find the closest fall color hot spot via a new interactive web map feature.

In the first update, the interactive web map, found at map.fpdcc.com, compiled a list of spots most likely to feature dramatic fall color.

Created in 2021, the interactive web map helps users locate hundreds of Forest Preserves locations, trails, amenities and activities available throughout 70,000 acres of natural public land. The new Fall Color activity filter joins 28 other searchable activities, many of which are free to participants, from fishing, biking, Nature Centers, picnic spots, canoeing to birding.
